FORT SELKIRK BIBLIOGRAPHY: 2023 UPDATE

Preface to the 2000 Edition

Gov't of Yukon, Bruce Barrett photographer

Fort Selkirk is a meeting place for two major river systems, the Yukon and the Pelly. Located near good hunting and fishing grounds and on a flat site, which was ideal for settlement, Fort Selkirk has been a gathering place for many years. A network of old trails and road beds, all meeting at Fort Selkirk, is still visible just beyond the town site. It has witnessed the meeting of cultures over generations and allows us to touch the past today.

The community of Fort Selkirk is one of the Yukon's most significant historic sites as it represents all major eras of Yukon history. During the precontact period, the area was used for fishing, camping, and trading by the local Northern Tutchone and Chilkat people from the Alaskan coast. One of the first encounters between the Indigenous population and the first European explorer/traders occurred here when Robert Campbell of the Hudson's Bay Company established his ill-fated trading post in the 1840s. Nearly forty years later, Arthur Harper set up another trading post and he was soon followed by Anglican missionary Reverend T. H. Canham, who established a mission nearby.

In 1898, the small post boomed to a busy settlement during the hectic days of the Klondike gold rush and Selkirk was even briefly considered as a capital for the newly-formed Yukon Territory. Selkirk was one of the few river communities to survive after the gold rush ended. In the quieter and more stable time that characterized the next fifty years, the town served as a distribution centre with an economy based on woodcutting and the fur trade. With the exception of one family, the settlement was abandoned by the early 1950s when most residents moved upriver to Minto to work on the new highway to Mayo. When the section to Dawson was completed in 1955, sternwheeler traffic ceased and most of the small river communities died out.

Today at Fort Selkirk, there are some forty buildings and other structures, two cemeteries and numerous archaeological sites. Every summer a work crew of Selkirk First Nations members spend time at the townsite to stabilize and restore the buildings, maintain the campground, and welcome visitors to their former home. Another Selkirk First Nation citizen offers guided interpretive tours of the site.

From 1984 to 1988, I was a researcher for the Fort Selkirk historic site. During this time, I investigated everything from historic building materials to lands records to archival sources all over the country. As well, I had the honour of organizing two oral history projects at the townsite. Near the end of my time with Heritage Branch, I compiled a Fort Selkirk bibliography. This was typed up by the Heritage Branch secretary using an early, now obsolete, word processing program.

Since that time, there have been many changes in the management of the site and several additional items relating to Fort Selkirk have been either created or discovered. The Fort Selkirk Management Group was established through the Fort Selkirk Management Plan (1990). The site is co-managed and co-owned pursuant to the Selkirk First Nation Final Land Claim Agreement (1997). Since its inception, the Fort Selkirk Management Group has been in charge of seasonal operations and overseen the preparation of preservation and interpretation plans for the historic site as well as a recent update to the management plan. Fort Selkirk has hosted culture camps, a number of archaeology projects, and important geological and paleontological research projects.

In August 2000, Chief Lucy McGinty of the Selkirk First Nation and Sue Edelman, Minister of Tourism, signed an update of the Fort Selkirk Management Plan at the Fort Selkirk townsite. At this gathering, Danny Roberts, the long-time “Mayor of Fort Selkirk,” was honoured for his stewardship of the site shortly before his death on August 20th.

Both the original and updated Fort Selkirk Management Plan recommended that as an important step in further research of the site, the 1988 bibliography be updated. This has been my task over the past few months. The new bibliography was much more detailed, includes sources found through Internet searches, and has grown from 31 to over 80 pages. A limited amount of additional research was conducted through web searches and Yukon Archives records. Since it is now in a digital format, the document can easily be added to at regular intervals.

This document has been enriched by the contributions of Pelly Crossing elders, other former Fort Selkirk residents and Fort Selkirk work crew members. They donated some of the photograph collections listed in this bibliography and identified people, places and time periods in many of the images. Many thanks to Kathy Alfred at Pelly Crossing who took time from yet another busy day to steer me through the records of the Selkirk First Nation library. At Heritage Branch, I am indebted to Ruth Gotthardt in the Archaeology section, Bruce Barrett at Historic Sites, and John Storer in Paleontology for assistance in identifying relevant government records. Finally, my appreciation to Bruce Barrett and Doug Olynyk at Heritage Branch who oversaw the project, and the Fort Selkirk Management Group for giving me the opportunity to do this interesting work.

It has been nearly a quarter century since the last bibliography update so unsurprisingly, there have been many developments in that time.

This latest edition has expanded, listing additional publications, photo collections, and websites. Some links from the previous document no longer work. Other documents can now be accessed online. Some digital databases are no longer available or have fewer resources listed than previously, while others provide more information. The collections of some repositories have been moved to other institutions. A few large Yukon Archives photo collections have been renamed and renumbered. New to this document is a selection of YouTube videos. A project of this type cannot be comprehensive. New records are always being found and other studies and reports are being produced. In some cases, such as the very large Library and Archives Canada collection, I have only provided a representative sample and suggest the researcher go directly to the online finding aid.

In 2021, Chief Darin Isaac of the Selkirk First Nation and Ranj Pillai, the Government of Yukon Minister of Tourism and Culture signed a second update to the Fort Selkirk Management Plan during a ceremony at the historic site. The title of the latest plan recognizes the Northern Tutchone name for Fort Selkirk and the people who lived there: Huchá Hudän, meaning Flatland People, referencing the large level area occupied by the site. A highlight of the plan is an expansion of the Fort Selkirk buffer zone, affording greater protection to the site. Lands within the buffer have been withdrawn from mining, prospecting, exploration and development of oil and gas or coal mining.

The cycle of conservation and maintenance work on the site continues. Building roofs that were installed in the 1980s are now in need of replacement. A major project was moving the Anglican Rectory inland in 2015 in response to riverbank erosion. Planning is underway for major conservation work on the Alex Coward garage.

The crew work camp has much improved over the years with a new dining /gathering facility, and sleeping cabins. Operations have become more energy efficient with a new generator, the installation of a solar system in 2010, followed by a solar system upgrade in 2022. A new washhouse is under construction. An Elder's cabin was built in 2010, making it easier for community elders to visit the site and share their knowledge.

Selkirk First Nation citizens—working as boat operators, cooks, construction workers and site interpreters—are essential to the preservation of their former home. At least two generations have worked at Fort Selkirk. As a former Selkirk worker from way back in the 1980s, I am impressed by the young workers who have since become community leaders, educators, and role models. Huchá Hudän is not just one of the most important historic sites in Yukon history but has also become a model for cooperation between a First Nation and Yukon Government to successfully manage, conserve and interpret a historic site for all Yukoners and visitors.

Many thanks to my project manager, Nansen Murray, who readily responded to my questions, and to the ever helpful staff of Yukon Archives, particularly Kira Quinsey. My partner Rob Ingram designed the cover and helped locating some photos.

PHOTOGRAPHS

Note: Many of the people and places in the following photographs have been identified with the kind assistance of Selkirk First Nation elders and other former residents of Fort Selkirk.

2023 Note: Yukon Archives has renamed a number of the collections and fonds but the image numbers of the Catalogued Photos remain the same. In some cases, an institution has changed its name but the YA collection retains the old name. In that case, I put the new name in brackets below, e.g. Canadian Museum of Civilization, now the Museum of Canadian History.

Fort Selkirk Culture History Project.

The following four videotapes were shot during the summer of 1989 by archaeologists Ruth Gotthardt, Norm Easton & Greg Hare. They had organized a culture camp at Fort Selkirk which was sponsored by the Selkirk First Nation and the Government of Yukon, Heritage Branch. Students from Pelly Crossing conducted archaeological excavations and elders taught the students about First Nations culture. The footage includes: scenes of Selkirk elders demonstrating traditional methods of making items such as a bow, fish trap, snares, baby carrier, etc.; telling stories; and student activities such as archaeology work and stick gambling.

The tapes are labelled as follows:

Fort Selkirk Culture History Project #1 (1989).

Fort Selkirk Culture History Project #2 (1989)

Fort Selkirk Culture History Project #3 (1989)

Fort Selkirk - fragment of fish basket construction (1989)

Location: Government of Yukon, Heritage Branch, Archaeology Section. [Whitehorse]

Restriction: Permission is needed from the Selkirk First Nation to view these videotapes.
